

Online Publishing Guidelines

These guidelines are intended to assist staff engaged in editing, producing and/or publishing online newsletters or E-journals which are hosted on the University network.

They do not apply to material which is made available online in reliance on the educational statutory licence contained in Part VB of the Copyright Act ("the Act") (eg course materials intended to be used by students).

Copyright

Liability for copyright infringement is not confined to the University. Individual staff members can also become personally liable to a copyright owner whose work is infringed. It is your responsibility to ensure that a publication for which you are responsible complies with copyright law.

You cannot assume that the author of an article is the owner of copyright. The copyright owner may (and often will) be the publisher of a journal in which the article was first published. A person submitting an article for publication should be asked to confirm, in writing, whether he or she is the owner of copyright. If so, the submitter should be asked to provide written permission for the article to be included in the publication. If the submitter is not the owner of copyright, you must approach the owner of copyright and obtain written permission for the article to be included in the publication. Signed permission slips MUST be retained.

Do not assume that material which is freely available on the internet (eg artistic works such as drawings and diagrams, photographs etc) can be reproduced and made available online without permission from the owner of copyright. By making such material available online themselves, the owner of copyright (assuming it is in fact the owner of copyright who has made the material available on the internet) can probably be taken to have granted permission for you to make a copy of the material for your own personal use. But this does not mean that you are free, without first obtaining permission, to reproduce the material in a newsletter/e-journal and make this available online. Unless it is absolutely clear from the site that permission is in fact given to use the material any way you like, the material must not be used without first obtaining written permission from the owner of copyright.

Linking

You should exercise caution when including hypertext links to third party material in your newsletter/ejournal. DO NOT link to material which you know has been posted online against the wishes of and without the permission of the copyright owner. DO NOT link in such a way as to frame the linked-to material with your own material. DO review linked to material from time to time to ensure that the link you have provided continues to link to the material you intended, and not some other material. If possible, AVOID deep links – always aim to link to the home page or "front door" of a site rather than somewhere deep within the site, unless this is particularly impractical.

Assistance and advice

Wai-Leng Wong, Acting Senior Information/Electronic Services Librarian, is available to assist you in your efforts to ensure that your publication is copyright compliant. If you have any questions about copyright or content restrictions generally, please contact Wai-Leng on 02-97014087 or wai-leng.wong@acu.edu.au.
